Research interests

Each of the studies indicated in the periods listed below leads to the publication of various texts, journal articles, essays in collective volume, scientific articles.

1984-1989: analysis of the foundations of semiotics and of modern and contemporary linguistic and textual disciplines, with extension to the fields of the analysis of art (in particular painting), of the visual arts, of the history of philosophy and linguistics, of epistemology.

1990-1991: analysis of the theater, of classics of literature, of specific aspects of linguistic, literary and grammatical theory.

1991-1997: analysis and semiotic and historiographical study of the theory and history of perfect languages, the set of projects, in the history of European culture, dedicated to the creation of philosophical systems founded ontologically rational, international, universal etc. aimed at replacing natural languages accused of a variety of errors and defects. The analysis results in different specific aspects, such as the history of the interpretation of the Egyptian hieroglyphic and of the Universal characters, typical facts of the culture of the Five and Seventeenth century Europeans.
Within this study the study of the history of French grammatical theory was born and contextualized, in particular the history of grammatical ideology according to which French would be a perfectly logical and rational language, which constitutes a particular aspect of the history of Perfect Languages. This study leads to the publication of two monographic volumes and the curation of a monographic issue of international scientific journal.

1997-2000: study and analysis of the fundamental characteristics of language and written and spoken communication, or of their specific qualities and differences. In this context there is an interest in history and the theory of rhetoric and the arts of speech, including the word in public.
This study leads to the publication of two monographic volumes.

2000-2004: in this period different theoretical interests are united (rhetoric, international communication, the pragmatics of the sign, the perfect languages, the universal character, the Egyptian hieroglyphic, the reconstruction of history and the theory of linguistics, grammar and semiotics, which results in a general rethinking of the history and the very nature of contemporary semiotics.

2005-2009: on the one hand the analyzes on the nature of semiotics and on the history of Perfect Languages and its peculiarities in a critical reexamination of the very nature of semiotics are resumed and continued, on the other critical attention is developed to different aspects of pedagogy and of the history of education theory.

2010 to today: the reflection on the nature of semiotics becomes a critique of the fundamentals themselves of the discipline, while completely new objects become centers of fundamental interest, in relation to each other. The starting point is the study of the reasons why experiences in 'physical presence' produce effects and intensities superior to experiences in physical distance, including 'electronic-virtual'. List the reasons for the superior quality of real physical presence experiences, begin some completely new directions of study that involve a paradigmatic overthrow of contemporary culture. On the one hand the criticism and the demystification of the electronic ideology diffused in contemporary society is developed in depth (which attributes to the virtual or electronic-informatics experience as a differential quality of the present), on the other the study of the theater is investigated as a case model of density and intensity of physical experience, as art based on the action and physical presence of the actor's body in action on stage. In this way the identification of interventions on the ground of NGOs and International Cooperation is born as a model case of concrete action that produces effects of density and intensity not only of individual personal experience, as in the case of the theatrical spectator, but also of experience social and collective, in terms of transforming the living conditions of a community. The whole of these lines of research leads to the formulation of a new semiotics that applies its tools, methods and principles of analysis to a set of facts identified as vital centers of a new theoretical and cultural paradigm in the process of formation and adjustment in culture contemporary social, a new social paradigm composed of areas that effectively cross each other creating a unique historical and cultural paradigm: in particular the interventions of the NGOs in International Cooperation operating in impoverished countries (sample model of a real case series of action according to the principles of new paradigm), the theory of degrowth (general theory, although not operative)real, the new social movements in Western countries that operate concretely according to the cornerstones of the new paradigm in the 'rich' countries. Overall, they are the cornerstones of the new paradigm called the 'paradigm of demercification' as it is essentially aimed at obstructing and removing the 'commodification society' of goods and people that characterize the present social and economic situation. Examining this paradigm, essential cultural and social fact of the future in formation, semiotics on the one hand returns to being critical discipline in the present, on the other it offers to those who work in the new paradigm tools, criteria and methods to improve their action: semiotics it thus turns from 'descriptive' science into 'prescriptive' science, that is 'committed' to action, according to social and cultural choices, innovatively changing the status of contemporary science. This study leads to the publication of two first monographic volumes.
